1. Salavat [N 53-21, E 55-52], a rayon center of the Bashkir ASSR, was situated on the railroad line connecting Ufa and Chkalov. It had a population of 60,000-70,000, two-thirds of whom were Bashkirs and the remainder Russians.

2. Salavat was an important center of the Bashkir oil industry. An oil combine (Neftianoy Kombinat), comprising three or four refineries, was located five or six kilometers west of the railroad tracks. A spur from the main rail line led to the refineries, and another track was recently constructed which branched off the main spur inside the refinery area. Employees of the combine traveled from Salavat to the refineries by trolley.

3. In 1953 a chemical combine was being constructed in the vicinity of the oil installations, on a site larger than that of the oil combine. [redacted] the project had not been completed in 1959, but some of its departments were scheduled to go into production within a year. The exact purpose of this enterprise was not known.

4. [redacted] the machine plant (Mekhanicheskii Zavod), also located near the oil combine, produced machinery for the refineries in addition to agricultural implements, such as seed-drills, harrows, and fertilizer spreaders, all manually operated. No further details were available on this plant.

5. The town power station (TETS) was located approximately 1.5 - 2 kilometers from the Salavat railroad station, west of the rail line. In addition to supplying power to the refineries and other plants in the vicinity, the power station also provided the domestic current for Salavat and its surroundings. The power station operated on lignite, which was transported by rail from the Kuznetsk coal mines. A new track, providing direct connection between Ufa and Chkalov, was recently constructed between Kuznetsk and Chkalov.

6. In 1956-1957 a television relay station was established in the vicinity of Salavat, where it occupied a one-story building, 50 x 10 meters in size. A television aerial (Televisyonnaya Vishka), approximately 100-120 meters high, was erected on a neighboring hill. No further details were available on this station.

7. The Salavat area contained three prison camps, which were subordinate to the prison camp directorate of the MVD in Ufa. These camps, No. 3, No. 4, and No. 5, were made up of prisoners who had been sentenced to various terms for criminal offenses. There were no political prisoners at these camps. Camps No. 3 and No. 5 maintained a comparatively liberal regime, and the prisoners were allowed to let their hair grow and wear civilian clothes. At Camp No. 4, however, the discipline was severe: the prisoners were not allowed to wear civilian clothes, their heads were shaved, and they worked one hour longer per day than the prisoners in the other two camps.

8. Since 1955 the attitude towards camp inmates had improved, but it still varied according to the prisoners' behavior, productivity, and discipline. The prisoners were allowed to receive a monthly parcel from home and a short monthly visit from members of their families. At six-month intervals, two to three-day family visits were also allowed. Weekly movies were introduced and elementary schools established for the illiterate prisoners. In many camps trade courses in metal-work, carpentry, and the like, have also been introduced. Camp conditions were frequently investigated by inspectors from both the Ministry (MVD) and the prison camp directorate.

9. The prisoners were paid for their work and, after the cost of their food and clothing had been deducted, a sum of 120-125 rubles per month was entered into their account, so that they could purchase various commodities at the camp shop.

10. The prisoners could lodge complaints against their superiors to the chief prison camp directorate, the Ministry (MVD) or the Chief Prosecutor of the USSR. Some prisoners even appealed to the Party Central Committee. In every case, the institution concerned would answer immediately and promise to investigate the matter. It had been the practice in recent years to permit the local Party institutions to deal with the complaints of prisoners confined in their areas. The Salavat town Party committee once dealt with a complaint from a prisoner in Camp No. 4, who maintained that his wages were often arbitrarily cut. As a result of the investigation which ensued, the head of the planning department of the camp was dismissed.
